For if this line is cut into unequal segments, the result is the contingent as the natural and what is for the most part, and also the contingent as the infrequent, which includes chance and spontaneity. Sign In Don't have an account? Spencer's interest in psychology derived from a more fundamental concern with nature. For example, aggression was a survival instinct which had been necessary in the primitive conditions of life, but was maladaptive in advanced societies. The tension between positivism and his residual deism ran through the entire System of Synthetic Philosophy. No man could be more simple, more modest, more absolutely unassuming, and affectations of any kind were wholly alien to the complete clarity of his nature. As I wrote in an article: The part of the exchange between Mill and Whewell that nature moves from the simple to the complex. Spencer initially followed up the scientific interests encouraged by his father and studied engineering.
