In this interpretive text, Romani rightly notes, for example, the apparent contradiction of the title of this book, which aims to recapture, through the fiction of a posthumous dialogue, an absence: the realm of family and affections evoked by the title is inseparable from the collective outcry against the all-too public horrors of the Shoah. My reason for avoiding that category is quite simple. Even at the level of pure script, before any staging process actually begins, the writer and the actor are engaged in a form of authorial collaboration which is logically implied by the idea of theatre-making that informs the contemporary professional stage and which consequently is legally called for by the contract that binds them in partnership.

This is not at all the case with Dante who has a very clear and a very definite difference. This difference is further underlined by the levels that separates them: Brunetto in the embankment "argine" below, and Dante with Virgil on the ridge. This collection of essays reinforces the fact that the call for further research in this area is more than justified.

Poter dare il proprio voto a Miss Italia, quasi un contributo patriottico. Finally to Metcalfe, many communities retained their Christian faith, even while adopting Arabic culture and language.
